

ined minerals are essential to many sectors of the economy, from information technology to renewable energy. The mining industry extracts, refines, consumes, and safely disposes of thousands of tons of minerals every day and is regulated by numerous state and federal agencies to protect public health and the environment.

Monitoring for metals (common byproducts of mineral mining) in ground and surface waters falls under